ORDER DISMISSING APPEAL

This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction, pursuant to a jury trial, on three counts of felony DUI. Appellant argues that the evidence proffered at trial was insufficient to sustain his conviction, and that the jury instruction defining "actual physical control" was prejudicially improper. Additionally, appellant argues that the statutory phrase "actual physical control" is unconstitutionally vague, that the district court erred in admitting certain evidence, and that the police officer's stop violated his Fourth Amendment rights. After careful review of appellant's arguments, we conclude that they are without merit.

Appellant first contends that the evidence adduced at trial was insufficient to sustain his conviction. Specifically, appellant argues that the evidence presented at trial merely established that he was a passive occupant in his vehicle which, at the time of his arrest, was serving as his stationary shelter. We disagree.

After having had the benefit of oral argument on this matter and based on our review of the record on appeal, we conclude that the jury, acting reasonably, could have found the elements of felony DUI beyond a reasonable doubt. From the evidence presented at trial, the jury could have found that appellant became intoxicated at a restaurant, drove home, and then fell asleep in his vehicle in front of his home with the vehicle's engine running and its headlights turned on. Additionally, the evidence at trial established that this was appellant's third DUI conviction within seven years, thereby satisfying the felony threshold. Because the evidence presented at trial must be construed in a light most favorable to the prosecution, see Koza v. State, 100 Nev. 245, 250, 681 P.2d 44, 47 (1984), we conclude that appellant's conviction rests on sufficient evidence. See NRS 484.379; NRS 484. 3792 (1) (c) . See also Lay v. State, 110 Nev. 1189, 1192, 886 P.2d 448, 450 (1994); Rogers v. State, 105 Nev. 230, 23334, 773 P.2d 1226, 1228 (1989).

Appellant next contends that the jury instruction defining the term "actual physical control" was prejudicially improper. Moreover, appellant asserts that the district court compounded this error by rejecting his proposed instruction No. 1 and by advising the jury that it needed only to consider, and not find, each of the Rogers factors enumerated in Instruction

No. 14. We disagree.

With regard to Instruction No. 14, we note that the district court instructed the jury on the meaning of the statutory term "actual physical control" by using the definition of that term contained in Rogers. Because Instruction No. 14 was an accurate statement of the law, the district court did not err in so instructing the jury. See Ford v. State, 99 Nev. 209, 215, 660 P.2d 992, 995 (1983).

Further, the district court did not err in rejecting appellant's proposed Instruction No. 1. To the extent that appellant's proposed Instruction No. 1 attempted to differentiate between felony DUI and the misdemeanor offense of being "intoxicated in or about a motor vehicle, " the distinctions between these two offenses were adequately conveyed to the jury through Instruction Nos. 14 and 15. See Barron v. State, 105 Nev. 767, 773, 783 P.2d 444, 448 (1989) (reiterating that if a proffered instruction "misstates the law or is adequately covered by other instructions, it need not be given").

Additionally, the district court's response to the jury's question was not erroneous. The list of factors we set forth in Rogers is not exhaustive, and we have never maintained that each factor must be met before a determination of "actual physical control" can be established. Accordingly, the district court's response to the jury's question--in which the court advised the jury that it needed to consider, though not necessarily find, each of the Rogers factors --comported with existing law and was not erroneous.

Appellant next contends that due to the legislature's and this court's alleged failure to define the term "actual physical control," with precision, he was denied fair notice that his conduct was proscribed; thus, appellant contends that the statutory phrase "actual physical control" is unconstitutionally vague. This argument is not persuasive.'

Pursuant to Rogers and its progeny, appellant had ample notice, albeit perhaps constructive notice, that an individual could be found to be in "actual physical control" of a vehicle when that individual was found intoxicated and asleep in the driver's seat, with the vehicle's engine running and headlights turned on, while parked on a public street. Accordingly, based on the specificity of the statute itself, along with our subsequent construction of the statute in Rogers and its progeny, we conclude that appellant has failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that the statutory term N'actual physical control'" is unconstitutionally vague. See Cunningham v. State, 109 Nev. 569, 570, 855 P.2d 125, 125, (1993); Childs v. State, 107 Nev. 584, 587, 816

P.2d 1079, 1081 (1991).

Appellant next contends that the district court erred in allowing the testimony of the Nevada Bell records custodian and in admitting evidence of appellant's telephone records. We disagree. The entire thrust of appellant's defense was that he drove home sober, drank alcohol in his home, talked to his stepson and neighbor on the telephone, and then went outside to his vehicle and fell asleep. Conversely, the State maintained that appellant became intoxicated at a restaurant, drove home under the influence, parked his car in front of his home, and then fell asleep. Therefore, appellant's presence or absence from his apartment on the night of November 27, 1996, is not collateral, and thus, contrary to appellant's assertion, NRS 50.085(3) is inapposite.

Accordingly, because the Nevada Bell records custodian's testimony and appellant's telephone records were probative and relevant to a material issue, the district court's admission of such evidence was not manifestly wrong. See Petrocelli v. State, 101 Nev. 46, 52, 692 P.2d 503, 508 (1985).

Appellant last contends that the police officer's investigatory stop was improper because the officer lacked the requisite reasonable and articulable suspicion of criminal activity necessary to approach appellant's vehicle. This argument is not persuasive.

Based on our review of the record on appeal, we conclude that the police officer's approach towards appellant's vehicle, and the officer's act of tapping on the driver's side window, did not constitute an investigatory stop for which the officer needed a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Because appellant's vehicle was parked on a public street, the officer in question could permissibly approach appellant's vehicle to question the appellant or inquire into his welfare without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. See Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497 (1983); State v. Burkholder, 112 Nev. 535, 915 P.2d 886 (1996).

Accordingly, the police officer did not need a reasonable and articulable suspicion of criminal activity to approach appellant's vehicle, and thus the encounter did not constitute an improper investigatory stop in violation of appellant's Fourth Amendment rights.

Therefore, after reviewing appellant's issues on appeal and concluding that they lack merit, we

ORDER this appeal dismissed

[1] We have recently rejected a vagueness challenge to NRS 484.379(1) (c) in Sereika v. State, 114 Nev. 142, 955 P.2d 175 (1998). Although the constitutional challenge in Sereika was not specifically limited to the "actual physical control" wording of the statute we held that NRS 484.379(1)(c), in its entirety, was "very specific" and "not unconstitutionally vague." Id. at 145-46, 955 P.2d at 177. We have no desire to revisit our holding in Sereika.

NOW, Lyle T. Shelton, Appellant, and respectfully petitions this Honorable Court for a rehearing pursuant to NRAP 40 and a stay of the issuance of the remittitur pursuant to NRAP 41.

This Petition is brought on the grounds that this Court has overlooked or misapprehended a material matter of fact and a material issue of law pertaining to the Appellant's fifth issue on appeal: "The investigatory stop was violative of the Appellant's Fourth Amendment rights" (Blue brief, pp. 30-34; Grey brief, pp. 13-17).

DATED this 28 day of December, 1998.

Respectfully Submitted,

STATEMENT OF FACTS

We believe that the facts, as stated at pages 1-3 of the blue brief, are undisputed:

Daniel Myers, an officer with the Reno Police Department, was on patrol at approximately 11:30 p.m. on November 27, 1996, in the area of Cashill and Skyline Blvds. in Reno. As he drove north on Cashill, he saw a vehicle legally parked on the east side of the road. Mr. Shelton's vehicle was parked facing north, with its lights on and motor running. Officer Myers did not see anyone in the vehicle at first, and his first concern was that someone might be hurt or the vehicle might have been subjected to a vehicle burglary. As he drove by slowly, however, he saw Mr. Shelton in the driver's seat, asleep or unconscious, and Mr. Shelton was leaning back against the seat. The seat was partially reclined. Mr. Shelton's hands were below the window. Mr. Shelton's seatbelt was unfastened. Officer Myers believed that when he first passed by, the vehicle was illegally parked as an unattended, running vehicle; but when he pulled up and saw Mr. Shelton in the driver's seat, he knew of no criminal violation at that point. He had no knowledge that anything illegal had occurred, and had no knowledge that Mr. Shelton needed any kind of assistance. Officer Myers tapped on the Appellant's window, to attempt to arouse him. After tapping on the roof of the car, Mr. Shelton came to in a startled fashion and started slapping hard at the driver's side window. Officer Myers yelled at the Appellant to turn off his engine. Mr. Shelton did so. Officer Myers asked Mr. Shelton to step out of his vehicle. Mr. Shelton did so. Mr. Shelton was parked in front of his own home. It is not unusual for people in that particular neighborhood to park their vehicles on the street.

Mr. Shelton's position is that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Officer Myers directed him to exit his vehicle, and investigated him further. Mr. Shelton asserts that, at the time he was told to leave his vehicle, Officer Myers had no information that Mr. Shelton or anyone in that neighborhood had been involved in, or was the victim of, any criminal activity, and that there was no evidence at that point in time that Mr. Shelton was in any apparent or known distress. Further, at the time Officer Myers directed Mr. Shelton to exit the vehicle, Officer Myers had no information that Mr. Shelton had been drinking or was under the influence of intoxicants.

Both Respondent and this Court appear to concede, implicitly, that Officer Myers had no probable cause or reasonable suspicion to investigate anything, whether criminal/traffic violations or health and safety concerns, at the time Officer Myers directed Mr. Shelton to exit his vehicle. However, the position of the State is that Mr. Shelton, under those circumstances, has no Fourth Amendment rights; Officer Myers had the unfettered discretion to order Mr. Shelton to exit the vehicle, regardless of any cause or suspicion.

In its Order Dismissing Appeal, filed November 24, 1998, this Court adopted the State's position. Specifically, this Court stated:

Based on our review of the record on appeal, we conclude that the police officer's approach towards Appellant's vehicle, and the officer's act of tapping on the driver's side window, did not constitute an investigatory stop from which the officer needed a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Because Appellant's vehicle was parked on a public street, the officer in question could permissibly approach Appellant's vehicle to question the Appellant or inquire into his welfare without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. See: Elorida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497 (1983); State v. Burkholder, 112 Nev. 535, 915 P. 2d 886 (1996). Accordingly, the police officer did not need a reasonable and articulable suspicion of criminal activity to approach Appellant's vehicle, and thus the encounter did not constitute an improper investigatory stop in violation of Appellant's Fourth Amendment rights.

DISCUSSION

We respectfully submit that this Honorable Court has severely misapprehended the issue. We don't disagree with the proposition that a police officer can approach a vehicle, tap on the driver's side window, wake the driver up, and signal to the driver to turn off the engine. But had Officer Myers done that, and nothing more, this case never would have happened. This case happened because Officer Myers ordered Mr. Shelton to exit the vehicle. Once Mr. Shelton complied, then, and only then, did Officer Myers discover Mr. Shelton's intoxication, which necessarily lead to his arrest.

The issue, therefore, is not whether a police officer can approach a vehicle or tap on a driver's side window without probable cause or a reasonable suspicion; the issue is whether such an officer can order a driver out of the car without probable cause or a reasonable suspicion.

The two cases cited by this Court do not address the issue. The holding of the United States Supreme Court in Florida v. Rover, supra, is that the defendant, who was a nervous young man paying cash for an airline ticket under an assumed name and carrying heavy bags, could be stopped on foot by the police in an airport and detained temporarily while the police attempted to dispel suspicions that he was a drug courier; however, the scope of that stop did not allow the police to retain his airplane tickets and driver's license and tell him that he was not free to depart.

Relying on this Court held in Burkholder that the police, while engaging in a "proactive drug recognition assignment" on foot, could approach a person on the street, and ask him if the police could search him without implicating his Fourth Amendment protections. Burkholder, 112 Nev. 538-39.

These problems attend, and cannot be reconciled with this Honorable Court's decision herein:

First, Royer and Burkholder are both "on foot" cases. This, however, is an "automobile" case, and the distinction is with a dramatic difference. As pointed out at page 13 of the grey brief, the United States Supreme Court has made it clear that the ability to order anybody - driver or passenger - out of a vehicle for any reason depends on a legitimate traffic stop to begin with. Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 117 S. Ct. 882, 884-86, 137 L. Ed. 2d 41 (1997); Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 53, 117 S. Ct. 417, 420-21, 136 L. Ed. 2d 347 (1996), and cases cited therein. Ordering a passenger out of a vehicle remains a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, but when it follows a lawful traffic stop, it is a justified seizure. United States v. Shabazz, 993 F. 2d 431, 437 (5th Cir. 1993), citing Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977).

Obviously, Wilson and Robinette are the apposite Supreme Court authority, while equally as obviously, is inapposite. In fact, after this Honorable Court decided this appeal, the United States Supreme Court handed down Knowles v.Iowa, U. S. (67 U.S.L.W. 4027-28, 12-8-98). There, the United States Supreme Court unanimously held that where the police stop a defendant for speeding and issue a citation, the Fourth Amendment does not permit an officer to order a defendant out of a car and conduct a full field-type search of the vehicle. In so holding, the United States Supreme Court noted that while concern for officer safety justified a "minimal, additional intrusion" of ordering a driver and passengers out of a car after a routine traffic stop, that concern did not by itself justify the often considerably greater intrusion attending a full field-type search. Once a police officer orders a suspect out of a vehicle, further investigation depends on the standards of Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), that is, a reasonable suspicion that the person may be armed and dangerous. Knowles 67 U.S.L.W. at 4028.

Secondly, even before the United States Supreme Court handed down Wilson, Robinette, and Knowles, the authority cited by Respondent to this Court pages 23-27 of the red brief proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that the distinction herein is the proper law and Respondent's position to this Court to the contrary is just plain illegal.

Both State v. Zubartia, 839 P. 2d 1237 (Idaho App. 1992) and People v.Murray, 560 N.E. 2d 309 (111. 1990), cited at pp. 26 and 27 of the red brief, state for this proposition: it is not a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment for an officer to approach and interrogate a person seated in a park vehicle. A request for the suspect to open the door or roll down the window equally permissable. The encounter may be characterized as a seizure, however if the officer orders, rather than requests, that the occupant open the door or the car. Murray, 560 N.E. 2d at 313-14, citing Jones v. United States, 391 A. 1188, 1190 (D.C. 1978); State v. Smith, 233 S.E. 2d 30, 32 (Ga. App. 1975, W. LaFave Search & Seizure, 9.2 (h) at 416 (2d. Ed. 1987); Zubiarta, 839 P. 2d at 1241, distinguishing State v. McAfee, 783 P. 2d 874 (Idaho App. 1989)

Officer Myer's specific testimony appears at AA15:108-09 (9-11) as follows:

"Q: After he shut the vehicle off, were you able to communicate a little easier with this individual?

A: I attempted to continue to communicate with him.

Q: Was it sucessful or unsuccessful?

A: It was a delayed response, and he asked for things. What I asked him to do then was to step out of the car. And instead of getting out of the car or attempting to open the door, what he did was he put his hand over as if to activate, I expect, where the controls were for electric windows, which, of course, was unsuccessful because he had turned the ignition off and there was no power to the electric windows. I continued to ask him to open the door; however, he diverted his attention and started trying to manipulate controls in an apparent effort to turn off the lights, which, eventually, he did turn off the headlights to the car; and then, he turned the ignition to the "On" position, didn't restart the car, and then lowered the window instead of getting out of the car as I'd asked.

Once the window was down, I was still trying to get him to step out of the car. However, the ignition was still turned to the "on" position, even though the car was not running, and the radio was on. And, again, the driver became distracted to that, and he started pushing at the radio itself, like at the buttons and things, and I could hear, because the radio was up loud enough, it was changing the channels, and he continued to do that until he finally pushed a button which turned the radio off. At that time, I was I able to get him to open the door and step out of the car."

Clearly, on this record, we are talking about a suspect obeying a repeated command to exit the vehicle. In order for that police directive to pass constitutional muster, there must have at least been a reasonable suspicion, either of criminal activity or ordinance violation afoot or some type of public safety concern.

Third, it is legally improper for this Court or any other Court to rely on Royer for the proposition that the police can request citizens to do anything without probable cause. Royer was a 5-to-4 holding, upholding suppression based on the scope of the investigatory stop (as opposed to the fact of it), but Justice Brennan, concurring in the result, dissented on the point of the initial stop. He noted that, per Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 99 S. Ct. 2248, 60 L. Ed. 2d 824 (1979), the scope of any type of investigation must be extremely limited, or the exception will swallow the general rule that the Fourth Amendment searches and seizures are reasonable only if based on probable cause. 460 U.S. at 510-11, 103 S. Ct. at 133 1.

Because only four justices out of the nine agreed on the lack of probable cause ruling, it was error for this Court to cite Royer with any authority, either here or in Burkholder. It is well settled that when no single rationale commands a majority of the Supreme Court, the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those members who concurred in the judgment on the narrowest grounds. City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Company, 486 U.S. 750, 764, n. 9, 108 S. Ct. 2138, 2148, n. 9, 100 L. Ed. 2d 771 (1988), and cases cited therein. Thus, the Court's holding has to do with the scope of the investigatory stop, not the fact of it.

Fourthly, two courts have made the following comments regarding Royer: A) it really applies only in cases that involve suspicions or pretexts involving drug traffic inGraham v. State, 705 A. 2d 82, 94-95 (Md. App. 1998). In other words, in cases that don't involve drug traffickers or drug trafficking, Royer simply is inapposite. That, of course, is the situation at bar. B) Royer is premised on the initial, brief encouter being under the circumstances where a reasonable person would feel free to leave without threat of compulsion or reprisal. United States v. Brumfield, 910 F. Supp. 1528, 1534 (D. Colo. 1996). If officer Myers was as persistant in telling Mr. Shelton to get out of his car as he testified, then obviously Mr. Shelton was not "free to leave at any time."

In sum, this Court's summary treatment of this issue is tantamount to saying that there is no such thing as the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and police are free to order people out of their vehicles at any time and investigate them for any reason, or, more to the point, for no reason at all. In no possible way is that the law of this country! This matter must be reheard, and this injustice must be corrected.

We believe that the facts, as stated at pages 1-3 of the blue brief, are undisputed:

Mr. Shelton did so. Officer Myers asked Mr. Shelton to step out of his vehicle. Mr. Shelton did so. Mr. Shelton was parked in front of his own home. It is not unusual for people in that particular neighborhood to park their vehicles on the street.

Mr. Shelton's position is that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Officer Myers directed him to exit his vehicle, and investigated him further. Mr. Shelton asserts that, at the time he was told to leave his stop from which the officer needed a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Because Appellant's vehicle was parked on a public street, the officer in question could permissibly approach Appellant's vehicle to question the Appellant or inquire into his welfare without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. See: Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497 (1983); State v. Burkholder, 112 Nev. 535, 915 P. 2d 886 (1996). Accordingly, the police officer did not need a reasonable and articulable suspicion of criminal activity to approach Appellant's vehicle, and thus the encounter did not constitute an improper investigatory stop in violation of Appellant's Fourth Amendment rights.

In its Order Dismissing Appeal, filed November 24, 1998, this Court adopted the State's position. Specifically, this Court stated:

Based on our review of the record on appeal, we conclude that the police officer's approach towards Appellant's vehicle, and the officer's act of tapping on the driver's side window, did not constitute an investigatory

DISCUSSION

We respectfully submit that this Honorable Court has severely misapprehended the issue. We don't disagree with the proposition that a police officer can approach a vehicle, tap on the driver's side window, wake the driver up, and signal to the driver to turn off the engine. But had Officer Myers done that, and nothing more, this case never would have happened. This case happened because Officer Myers ordered Mr. Shelton to exit the vehicle. Once Mr. Shelton complied, then, and only then, did Officer Myers discover Mr. Shelton's intoxication, which necessarily lead to his arrest.

The issue, therefore, is not whether a police officer can approach a vehicle or tap on a driver's side window without probable cause or a reasonable suspicion; the issue is whether such an officer can order a driver out of the car without probable cause or a reasonable suspicion.

The two cases cited by this Court do not address the issue. The holding of the United States Supreme Court in Florida v. Rover, supra, is that the defendant, who was a nervous young man paying cash for an airline ticket under an assumed name and carrying heavy bags, could be stopped on foot by the police in an airport and detained temporarily while the police attempted to dispel suspicions that he was a drug courier; however, the scope of that stop did not allow the police to retain his airplane tickets and driver's license and tell him that he was not free to depart.

Relying on this Court held in Burkholder that the police, while engaging in a "proactive drug recognition assignment" on foot, could approach a person on the street, and ask him if the police could search him without implicating his Fourth Amendment protections. Burkholder, 112 Nev. 538-39.

These problems attend, and cannot be reconciled with this Honorable Court's decision herein:

First, Royer and Burkholder are both "on foot" cases. This, however, is an "automobile" case, and the distinction is with a dramatic difference. As pointed out at page 13 of the grey brief, the United States Supreme Court has made it clear that the ability to order anybody - driver or passenger - out of a vehicle for any reason depends on a legitimate traffic stop to begin with. Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 117 S. Ct. 882, 884-86, 137 L. Ed. 2d 41 (1997); Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 53, 117 S. Ct. 417, 420-21, 136 L. Ed. 2d 347 (1996), and cases cited therein. Ordering a passenger out of a vehicle remains a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, but when it follows a lawful traffic stop, it is a Justified seizure. United States v. Shabazz, 993 F. 2d 431, 437 (5th Cir. 1993), citing Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977).

Obviously, Wilson and Robinette are the apposite Supreme Court authority, while equally as obviously, Royer is inapposite. In fact, after this Honorable Court decided this appeal, the United States Supreme Court handed down Knowles v. Iowa, U. S. (67 U.S.L.W. 4027-28, 12-8-98). There, the United States Supreme Court unanimously held that where the police stop a defendant for speeding and issue a citation, the Fourth Amendment does not permit an officer to order a defendant out of a car and conduct a full field-type search of the vehicle. In so holding, the United States Supreme Court noted that while concern for officer safety justified a "minimal, additional intrusion" of ordering a driver and passengers out of a car after a routine traffic stop, that concern did not by itself justify the often considerably greater intrusion attending a full field-type search. Once a police officer orders a suspect out of a vehicle, further investigation depends on the standards of Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), that is, a reasonable suspicion that the person may be armed and dangerous. Knowles 67 U.S.L.W. at 4028.

Secondly, even before the United States Supreme Court handed down Wilson, Robinette, and Knowles, the authority cited by Respondent to this Court pages 23-27 of the red brief proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that the distinction herein is the proper law and Respondent's position to this Court to the contrary is just plain illegal.

Both State v. Zubartia, 839 P. 2d 1237 (Idaho App. 1992) and People v. Murray, 560 N.E. 2d 309 (111. 1990), cited at pp. 26 and 27 of the red brief, state for this proposition: it is not a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment for an officer to approach and interrogate a person seated in a park vehicle. A request for the suspect to open the door or roll down the window equally permissable. The encounter may be characterized as a seizure, however if the officer orders, rather than requests, that the occupant open the door or the car. Murray, 560 N.E. 2d at 313-14, citing Jones v. United States, 391 A. 1188, 1190 (D.C. 1978); State v. Smith, 233 S.E. 2d 30, 32 (Ga. App. 1975, W. LaFave Search & Seizure, 9.2 (h) at 416 (2d. Ed. 1987); Zubiarta, 8392d at 1241, distinguishing State v. McAfee, 783 P. 2d 874 (Idaho App. 1989)

Officer Myer's specific testimony appears at AA15:108-09 (9-11) as follows:

Q: After he shut the vehicle off, were you able to communicate a little easier with this individual?

A: I attempted to continue to communicate with him.

Q: Was it sucessful or unsuccessful?

A: It was a delayed response, and he asked for things. What I asked him to do then was to step out of the car. And instead of getting out of the car or attempting to open the door, what he did was he pŭt his hand over as if to activate, I expect, where the controls were for electric windows, which, of course, was unsuccessful because he had turned the ignition off and there was no power to the electric windows. I continued to ask him to open the door; however, he diverted his attention and started trying to manipulate controls in an apparent effort to turn off the lights, which, eventually, he did turn off the headlights to the car; and then, he turned the ignition to the "On" position, didn't restart the car, and then lowered the window instead of getting out of the car as I'd asked.

Once the window was down, I was still trying to get him to step out of the car. However, the ignition was still turned to the "on" position, even though the car was not running, and the radio was on. And, again, the driver became distracted to that, and he started pushing at the radio itself, like at the buttons and things, and I could hear, because the radio was up loud enough, it was changing the channels, and he continued to do that until he finally pushed a button which turned the radio off. At that time, I was I able to get him to open the door and step out of the car.

Clearly, on this record, we are talking about a suspect obeying a repeated command to exit the vehicle. In order for that police directive to pass constitutional muster, there must have at least been a reasonable suspicion, either of criminal activity or ordinance violation afoot or some type of public safety concern.

Third, it is legally improper for this Court or any other Court to rely or Royer for the proposition that the police can request citizens to do anything without probable cause was a 5-to-4 holding, upholding suppression based on the scope of the investigatory stop (as opposed to the fact of it), but Justice Brennan, concurring in the result, dissented on the point of the initial stop. He noted that, per Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 99 S. Ct. 2248, 60 L. Ed. 2d 824 (1979), the scope of any type of investigation must be extremely limited, or the exception will swallow the general rule that the Fourth Amendment searches and seizures are reasonable only if based on probable cause. 460 U.S. at 510-11, 103 S. Ct. at 133 1.

Because only four justices out of the nine agreed on the lack of probable cause ruling, it was error for this Court to cite with any authority, either here or in Burkholder. It is well settled that when no single rationale commands a majority of the Supreme Court, the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those members who concurred in the judgment on the narrowest grounds. City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Company, 486 U.S. 750, 764, n. 9, 108 S. Ct. 2138, 2148, n. 9, 100 L. Ed. 2d 771 (1988), and cases cited therein. Thus, the Court's holding has to do with the scope of the investigatory stop, not the fact of it.

Fourthly, two courts have made the following comments: A) Royer really applies only in cases that involve suspicions or pretexts involving drug traffic. Graham v. State, 705 A. 2d 82, 94-95 (Md. App. 1998). In other words, in cases that don't involve drug traffickers or drug trafficking, Royer simply is inapposite. That, of course, is the situation at bar. B) Royer is premised on the initial, brief encouter being under the circumstances where a reasonable person would feel free to leave without threat of compulsion or reprisal. United States v. Brumfield, 910 F. Supp. 1528, 1534 (D. Colo. 1996). If officer Myers was as persistant in telling Mr. Shelton to get out of his car as he testified, then obviously Mr. Shelton was not "free to leave at any time."

In sum, this Court's summary treatment of this issue is tantamount to saying that there is no such thing as the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and police are free to order people out of their vehicles at any time and investigate them for any reason, or, more to the point, for no reason at all. In no possible way is that the law of this country! This matter must be reheard, and this injustice must be corrected.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEVADA

LYLE THOMAS SHELTON,
Appellant
v.
THE STATE OF NEVADA
Respondent.

No. 31390

ANSWER TO SHELTON'S PETITION FOR REHEARING

COMES NOW, the State of Nevada, by and through counsel, to respectfully request that this Court enter an order denying Shelton's petition for rehearing. This request is predicated on NRAP 40, and the accompanying discussion.

DISCUSSION

Shelton's petition is governed by NRAP 40. in salient part, the rule provides that matters presented in the briefs and oral argument may not be reargued in the petition for rehearing, and no point may be raised for the first time on rehearing; on the other hand, rehearings may be allowed when it appears the Court has overlooked or misapprehended a material matter in the record or otherwise, or in such circumstances as will promote substantial justice. Given these standards, the State respectfully submits that Shelton's claim comes up short of the mark.

The thrust of Shelton's argument is centered on his belief that the Court misapprehended the (real) issue in this appeal, and, following that observation, he goes on to critique and criticize the Court's ruling, a ruling "tantamount to saying that there is no such thing as the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution." For the reasons to follow, the State respectfully submits that Shelton's argument lacks merit.

First, Shelton contends that the issue on appeal was whether an officer can order a driver out of a car without probable cause or reasonable suspicion. Petition, p. 4, lines 21-25. To the extent that this was not the issue decided by the Court, we might ask why it was not. The reasons could stem from the fact that this issue was not the issue presented in Shelton's Fast Track Statement or his opening Brief. The issue in the briefs addressed whether Shelton was subjected to what Shelton called a "traffic stop." Appellant's Appendix, pp. 73, 77, 79; Fast Track Statement, pp. 8-9; Opening Brief, pp. 30-34.1 Shelton's documents were remarkably silent, however, about Officer Meyers, request to have Shelton exit the car, and the constitutional significance of that event, if any. Consequently, to the extent the Court did not decide this new issue, rehearing is not allowed.

Shelton did give passing reference to this issue in his Reply Brief (Reply Brief, p. 13, lines 2-8) , as he mindlessly accused the undersigned of wanting to create a police state. After this accusation, however, Shelton merely returned to debating the propriety of a traffic stop. Reply Brief, pp. 13-17.

To the extent the Court did decide this issue, Shelton has failed to identify any material matter overlooked or misapprehended by the Court in doing so. We will turn to that discussion now.

In the context of discussing the merits of the real issue on appeal, Shelton presents a statement of facts. While many of the facts are not in dispute, or, at least, not in serious dispute, we must take exception to what Shelton has left out of his recital: namely, that before Officer Meyers asked Shelton to step out of the car, Officer Meyers tapped on the window of the car, in an effort to determine Shelton's wellbeing, and Shelton basically went berserk, "slapping at the driver's window on the inside very hard," so hard in fact that Officer Meyers thought the window would break. AA, pp. 108, 115. Up to that moment, even by Shelton's own cites, Officer Meyers did not do anything prohibited by the Constitution; indeed, Officer Meyers, up to that moment, did not know if the occupant of the car was dead, hurt, merely sleeping, or simply sleeping one off. Officer Meyers tapping on the window was designed to find out if Shelton was alright. AA, p. 115. Officer Meyers' request to have Shelton get out of the car was merely an extension of that concern. Cady v. Dumbrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 441 (1973); accord, State v. McAfee, 783 P.2d 874, 876-77 (Idaho App. 1989) - wherein a recently awakened defendant was asked to step outside of his vehicle prior to any attempt to inquire into his welfare. Couple these obviously legitimate concerns with Shelton's subsequent bizarre behaviors, actions which could only have served to pique Officer Meyers' concern for Shelton's welfare, and the reasonableness of Officer Meyers' conduct becomes even more reasonable. Perhaps this is why Shelton omitted these obviously material and outcome-oriented facts from his abbreviated and slanted recital.

With one notable exception, the remainder of Shelton's petition proceeds on the assumption that he is allowed to revisit the points and authorities already argued and rejected by this Court in his briefs and oral argument. Compare NRAP 40. Accordingly, rehearing should be denied.

The one exception to Shelton's overall strategy of revisiting his points and authorities involves his discussion of the recent United States Supreme Court decision in Knowles v. Iowa, 67 U.S.L.W. 4627, December 8, 1998.

This decision does not advance the debate of this case, however.

In Knowles, an Iowa police officer ticketed a driver for speeding, and incident to the issuance of the citation, conducted a full search of the car, without probable cause or reasonable suspicion, which netted some marijuana and drug paraphernalia. Knowles made a motion to suppress the seized items, because the search was not authorized by any exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement, particularly as a search incident to an arrest. Iowa, however, claimed that the search was authorized by a state statute and Iowa Supreme Court decisions interpreting the statute which upheld the officer's action.

Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court held that this full-blown search could not be justified on the basis of it being a search incident to an arrest, but the Court did observe that, in the case of a routine traffic stop, "the concern for officer safety in this context may justify the minimal additional intrusion of ordering a driver and passengers out of the car." As noted, however, we are not talking about a traffic stop or a search incident to a traffic stop in the present case. Accordingly, Knowles has absolutely no application here.

In short, Shelton has failed to present any arguments within the contemplation of NRAP 40, justifying the relief requested. Rehearing should therefore be denied.

I. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction after a jury trial. The judgment of conviction was entered orally, and later in writing, on November 13, 1997 (AA 13). A Notice of Appeal was filed on the same date. (AA 14) Therefore, this Court hasjurisdiction pursuant to NRS 177.015(3) and NRAP 4(b). Bail pending appeal has been granted.

Mr. Shelton was charged by Information with having committed a felony D.U.I., in violation of NRS 484.3792, in that he was in actual physical control" of a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor on November 27, 1996, having committed his third D.U.I. within seven years (AA 1). Mr. Shelton applied for habeas corpus, contending that the evidence was insufficient to force him to withstand a trial, and also that the term "actual physical control" as previously construed by this Court is unconstitutionally vague. (AA 2,3) The Court below, the Honorable Janet J. Berry, denied the challenge. (AA 7) Mr. Shelton then moved to suppress all evidence, contending that the investigatory stop of him was unconstitutional. (AA 8) That challenge was also denied. (AA 10) Mr. Shelton then went to jury trial, and the jury returned a guilty verdict. (AA 12)1

II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

Daniel Myers, an officer with the Reno Police Department, was on patrol at approximately 11:30 a.m. on November 27, 1996, in the area of Cashill and Skyline Boulevards in Reno. As he drove north on Cashill, he saw a vehicle legally parked on the east side of the road. (AA 15: 107 (2,5), 114 (31,32))Mr. Shelton's vehicle was parked facing north, with its lights on and motor running. Officer Myers did not see anyone in the vehicle at first, and his first concern was that someone might be hurt or the vehicle might have been subjected to a vehicle burglary. As he drove by slowly, however, he saw Mr. Shelton in the driver's seat, asleep or unconscious, and Mr. Shelton was leaning back against the seat. (AA 15: 108 (6-7)) The seat was partially reclined. Mr. Shelton's hands were below the window. Mr. Shelton's seatbeat was unfastened. (AA 15: 109(12)) Mr. Shelton was not positioned in a normal driving position. (AA 15: 116 (91)) Officer Myers believed that when he first passed by, the vehicle was illegally parked as an unattended, running vehicle; but when he pulled up and saw Mr. Shelton in the driver's seat, he knew of no criminal violation at that point. He had no knowledge that anything illegal had occurred, and had no knowledge that Mr. Shelton needed any type of assistance. (AA 15: 114-15 (30-37)) Officer Myers tapped on the Appellant's window, to attempt to arouse him. After tapping on the roof of the car, Mr. Shelton came to in a startled fashion and started slapping hard at the driver's side window. Officer Myers yelled at the Appellant to turn off his engine. Mr. Shelton turned the key in the wrong direction, grinding the starter. He turned the key back, and turned off the engine. Officer Myers asked Mr. Shelton to step out of his vehicle. Mr.Shelton attempted to manipulate the controls of the vehicle, turned off the headlights, turned the ignition key to the "on', position and lowered the power window. (AA 15: 109, 116 (9-10, 38)) At no time did Mr. Shelton attempt to grab the steering wheel. (AA 15: 116 (38)) Mr. Shelton appeared disoriented, and stated had been drinking earlier at a "place down on Wells Avenue." (AA 15: 109-110 (13-14))

Mr. Shelton had some reading glasses on the passenger seat of the vehicle. He needed them to read and to drive. (AA 15: Mr. Shelton was parked in front of his own home. (AA 115: 117 (43)) It is not unusual for people in that particular neighborhood to park their vehicles on the street. (AA 15: 9(50-51)) Officer Myers, and later Officer Meister, admitted they did not know at what time Mr. Shelton had left the restaurant; they thought it possible, since Mr. Shelton was impaired, that he thought what was meant by their question was what he had had to drink before he drove; and they did not ask him where he was going (AA 15: 117 (42); AA 16: 138 (34); 1341)).

Allison Benson, a long-time neighbor and friend of Mr. Shelton's, who has known the Appellant for six years, (AA 17: 152 (24)) Mr. Shelton has a habit of taking naps vehicle. Further, people who live in the row of condominiums where Mr. Shelton resides on Cashill generally park on the street, as the lot in the back is a very difficult place to park. (17 : 11 5 2 - 5 3 (2 6 - 2 7) Further, she called Mr. Shelton at his home on the evening of November 27, 1996, between 8:00 and 9:00 p.m., to invite him to dinner at her house the next day. (AA 17:53(27-28)).

Mr. Shelton testified. He resides at 3149 Cashill Blvd., Reno, Nevada. (AA 17: 156 (42)) He is a pilot who owns an air race business. (AA 17: 156 (42); 157 (44-46); 158 (47-48)) On November 27, 1996, he left work at 6:00 p.m. and ate dinner out. He then drove home and parked his vehicle on Cashill. (AA 17: "1-58 (46); 159 (51-52)) He then went into his home, where he was alone. (AA 17: 159 (52-53)) While inside his home, Mr. Shelton drank a 750 ml. period of white wine, which he kept in his refrigerator. (AA 17: 159 (53-54)) He subsequently received a call from Ms. Benson. (AA 17: 160 (55)) Mr. Shelton subsequently left his apartment to go to his vehicle, as he had left his briefcase in his vehicle, and wanted to look at some papers relative to his airplane project. (AA 17: 160-61 (58-59)) When Mr. Shelton got into his vehicle, he turned on the ignition and started the vehicle's engine in order to turn on the heater. He had the radio on. (A.A 17: 161 (60-61)) He turned on his vehicles headlights in order to read the odometer and make notes of the mileage in his log for I.R.S. purposes. (AA 17: 161 (61

Mr. Shelton became drowsy, put the seat into a reclined position, took off his glasses, and took a nap. He did not intend to drive the vehicle anywhere. (A-A 17: 162 (63-64, 65)) He was awakened by the police officer. He thought that the question asked by the officers had to do with what he drank at the restaurant before he drove home. (AA 17: 163 (67-68)).

III. STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. Is the evidence sufficient to sustain the judgment?

2. Was the jury instruction defining "actual physical control" prejudicially improper?

3. Is the term "actual physical control, as previously defined by this Court, unconstitutionally vague and ambiguous?

4. Was the investigatory stop of the Appellant violative of his Fourth Amendment rights?

5. Did the trial court commit prejudicial error in allowing the testimony of Merle Herman in order to pre-impeach the Appellant's anticipated testimony on a collateral matter?

IV. ARGUMENT

A. THE EVIDENCE IS INSUFFICIENT TO SUSTAIN THE VERDICT

In 1989, this Court handed down a quartet of "actual physical control" cases which, to this day, are the jurisprudence in this State of that prima facie element of NRS 484.379. Unfortunately, taken together, the cases have created an enormous amount of confusion in this area of the law, as exemplified by the opinion of Las Vegas Deputy City Attorney, Bruce Nelson, who wrote an article for the Nevada Lawyer in August 1995 entitled "As Clear As Mud: Actual Physical Control in a D.U.I. Case." (AA: 30-32).

1 Where the undersigned quotes from the rough draft transcript, AA 15, 16 and 17, numbers such as "107" references the page number of the Appellant's Appendix. The parenthesed numbers such as (2, 5) references the page numbers within the four-page spread of each page of the rough draft transcript.

2 We have never contended that Mr. Shelton was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor during this incident and we concede such now.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF NEVADA

LYLE T. SHELTON,
Appellant,
vs.
THE STATE OF NEVADA,
Respondent.

No. 31390

ORDER

On December 9, 1998, appellant filed a motion for an extension of time to file a petition for rehearing. Respondent has filed an opposition to the motion. Cause appearing, we grant appellant's motion. Accordingly, the clerk of this court shall forthwith file the petition for rehearing received on December 29, 1998. Respondent may, within fifteen (15) days of the date of this order, file an opposition to the petition for rehearing.

It is so ORDERED.

cc: Attorney General
Washoe County District Attorney
Richard F. Cornell

Appellant's motion for an extension of time also contained a request for a temporary stay of the remittitur to allow for the filing of the petition for rehearing. The remittitur not having issued, appellant's request for a temporary stay is denied as moot.

V. THE INVESTIGATORY STOP WAS VIOLATIVE OF THE APPELLANT'S FOURTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS.

The State's position appears to be that, as a matter of law, a police officer can approach a parked car and order the occupants out of it for no cause whatsoever; "officer safety concerns" are presumed as a matter of law. While this position might have some merit in a police state, it is not the law here.

First off, the U.S. Supreme Court seems to have made it relatively clear that the ability to order anybody-driver or passenger-out of a vehicle for any reason depends on a legitimate traffic stop to begin with. Maryland v. Wilson, U.S. 117 S.Ct. 882, 884-86, 137 L.Ed.2d 41 (1997); Ohio v. Robinette, U.S. 1 117 S.Ct. 417, 420-21, 136 L.Ed.2d 347 (1996), and cases cited therein. The rationale is that officer safety is a natural concern that follows a traffic stop. Wilson, 117 S.Ct. at 885-86. "Ordering a passenger out of a vehicle" remains a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment; but when it follows a lawftil traffic stop, it is a justified seizure. United States v. Shabazz, 993 F.2d 431, 437 (5th Cir 1993), citing Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977). But obviously, "officer safety" is not a concern viz. a sleeping occupant of a lawfully parked vehicle, who (at that point) is suspected of breaking no ordinance and is not suspected of having been the victim or the perpetrator of any offense.

Secondly, Officer Myers did not testify to any "safety" concerns-his or Shelton's-in ordering Shelton out of the vehicle. If this case had happened in Oregon, the post Robinette case of State v. Morton, 951 P.2d 179 (Or. App. 1997) would mandate suppression. That case holds that where the officer's testimony is that he stopped a motor vehicle on the basis of investigation of a crime, but there was no probable cause to justify the stop on any basis, the officer could not later attempt to justify ordering the occupants out of the vehicle on "alleged public safety concerns." Morton, 951 P.2d at 182.

As AA 8 makes clear, Appellant's Motion to Suppress was based upon the testimony given at the preliminary hearing, and as AA 10 makes clear, no further testimony was adduced at the hearing on the Motion to Suppress.

At the preliminary hearing, Officer Myers testified that as he drove past Mr. Shelton's vehicle, "He had a number of concerns as why I turned around; concern for the vehicle, concern for what might be going, some type of criminal activity or somebody breaking in the car, or left unattended or whatever."(AA 21:8)

On cross-examination, Officer Myers testified as follows:

Q: All right, when you said you turned around because you thought there was possibly some criminal activity, did it strike you that somebody could have been just warming up the car that night and waiting for it to warm up and there couldn't have been anything wrong whatsoever with the situation?

A: Yes. Other than the fact that there was a vehicle that had been left unattended that was running. If that

Q: But

A: Which may be a misdemeanor or something. But, yes, it did strike me as that. I just wanted to find out what the circumstances were.

Q: Just the fact that somebody had gone out and started up their car and let's say was warming it up and was waiting for it to warm up in the house, that wouldn't indicate to you any criminal activity per se?

A: I believe that there is a misdemeanor statute in Reno that says you are not supposed to leave an unattended vehicle running. However, other than that, it's done and it's done oftentimes during the winter.

Q: And you don't consider that criminal activity, do you?

A: Well, it may be a crime, but it's not often enforced, I don't think."

(AA 21: 16-17)

Then at trial, Officer Myers admitted that, by the second pass-by and before rapping on the window, he realized that the vehicle was not unattended, and that fact took away any possible technical parking ordinance violation. (AA 15: 114 (32-33)) He further admitted that with the information he saw that night, there was no criminal violation taking place. (AA 15: 114 (33)) Officer Myers admitted that he was not aware of anything illegal going on at the time he approached Mr. Shelton's vehicle. (AA 15: 115 (34)) He testified that he wanted to make a determination as to why the person [Mr. Shelton] appeared to be unconscious, sitting in the car, or sleeping, as he had no idea. (AA 15: 115 (35))

Thus, the record belies the State's contentions. This was not a "public safety assistance" encounter by any means. When Officer Myers first passed by the vehicle, he suspected that criminal activity might be afoot. However, by the time he rapped on Mr. Shelton's window, he knew that there was no crinfinal activity afoot--and certainly, the State has pointed to nothing in this record by which alleged criminal activity, even to the point of parking violations, could even be argued. Next, Officer Myers wanted to determine whether Mr. Shelton was sleeping or unconscious. However, upon rapping on the window, and before getting close enough to smell Mr. Shelton, Officer Myers knew that Mr. Shelton was sleeping, as Mr. Shelton awakened. And, as he awakened, there's nothing in this record to indicate that Mr. Shelton was in distress, prior to the time that Officer Myers ordered him out of his vehicle.

Thus, two things must be noted: 1) As in State v. Templeman , the affirming of a grant of a Motion to Suppress, where the initial reason for the stop was an investigation into vehicular activity that violated no law, the "later-formed" concerns about the defendants wellbeing should have been dispelled when the defendant exhibited well-being before being interrogated by the officers.

The proper scope of a stop ends when the reason for the initial stop has been completely processed and no further matter suggesting a broadening of the inquiry have been presented or such further matters have also been processed. State v. Ready, 556 N.W. 2d 264, 268-69 (Neb App. 1996) The Nebraska

Court of Appeals reversed the denial of the suppression motion in Ready,a mandate which should also attend here. As in R ad . the trial court here improperly based the alleged legality of the search on the Defendant's suspicious behavior after the police ordered the defendant out of the vehicle. See: Ready.

If this Court reaches this issue, it should hold that once Officer Myers approached the car and rapped on the window, and Mr. Shelton awakened and turned off the motor, at that point there was absolutely no reason-whether vehicle infraction, felony investigation, or public safety concern - for Officer Myers or for Mr. Shelton - to do anything further, and Officer Myers' encounter with Mr. Shelton should have ended right then and there. Because it did not, all matters which he found subsequent thereto must be suppressed.

DATED this day of 1998.

E. THE TRIAL COURT DID NOT ERR IN DENYING SHELTON'S MOTION TO SUPPRESS.

Shelton made a motion to suppress evidence he claimed was the fruit of an unreasonable seizure. The trial judge denied the motion; consequently, Shelton contends the trial judge erred.

The facts and circumstances surrounding the encounter between Officer Myers and Shelton are fully set forth above, so the State will not repeat them here again, but, obviously some of the points must be highlighted given Shelton's argument. Shelton's argument simply put is this: once Officer Myers concluded no crime was occurring in his presence, he had to return to his patrol vehicle and drive off; consequently, since Officer Myers proceeded to check into Shelton's welfare, he acted unreasonably, in violation of Shelton's Fourth Amendment rights, and the fruits of this unreasonable intrusion should have been suppressed. Frankly, the State respectfully submits, this contention should not detain the Court long.

If anything rings true from Officer Myers, trial testimony, it is this: Up to and including, the moment he rapped on Shelton's window, he did not know why Shelton was in his apparent unconscious state with the lights of his car on and the motor running. AA, Exhibit 15, pp. 33-35. Shelton suggests that, because officer Myers did not know or merely knew the car was legally parked and occupied by an man, albeit unconscious, behind the steering wheel, he had to remain ignorant of all other details, and simply drive away. By implication, Shelton argues Officer Myers could not check into Shelton's welfare or take any other action. In other words, because Officer Myers did not know whether Shelton was in distress, hurt or dead, he was absolutely precluded from finding out.(6)

The Fourth Amendment provides that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated.

BEST AVAILA

Certainly, Shelton's car, as an effect, and his person are protected by the Fourth Amendment. But not every officer / citizen encounter is a seizure. Indeed, in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 19 n.16 (1968), the Court observed that not all personal intercourse between police officers and citizens involves seizures of the person. Accord, State v. Burkholder, 112 Nev. (Adv Op. 74, May 1, 1996) - wherein the court observed that not all interactions between policemen and our citizenry involved a seizure of the person, and went on to observe that mere police questioning does not constitute a seizure the police may randomly without probable cause or reasonable suspicion - approach people in public places and speak with them. Having said this, however, it is far from clear that Shelton's rights were violated in this case.

Preliminarily, it should be noted that, although Shelton spreads a good bit of ink over the topic of traffic stops and why this encounter lacks sufficient cause or justification for the stop and resultant intrusion, this was no traffic stop. After all, Shelton was already parked; Shelton being stopped at the curb was not the result of State action. Accord. United State v. Kim. 25 F.3d 1426, 1430 (9th Cir. 1994). Consequently, the first question becomes how should the Myers/Shelton initial encounter be classified and what level of cause, if any, is needed to justify Officer Myers' actions.

First, it would appear that, up and including the time that Shelton got out of his car, there was no Fourth Amendment seizure; consequently, no level of suspicion was necessary. The overwhelming majority of cases, perhaps even the uniform rule is that a police officer may approach a parked car in a public place without that action constituting a seizure or investigative stop or any other higher echelon of seizure. Accord, State v. Zubizareta, 839 P.2d 1237 (Idaho 1992); State v. Kersh, .13 N.W. 566 (Iowa 1981) ; Crauthers v. State, 727 P. 2d 9, 11 (Alaska App. 1980) ; State v. Marks 602 P.2d 1344, 1350 (Kan. 1979); see generally, Lafave. 3
Search and Seizure, Section 9.2 (h) , pp. 408-9 (2nd Edition 1987) - As a result, Officer Myers did not violate Shelton's Fourth Amendment protection by approaching Shelton in a public place and tapping on hiswindow and asking him some questions. Accord, Florida v. Rover. 460 U.S. 491, 497-498 (1983).

In addition, and as conceded by Shelton, officer Myers did not really know what was confronting him that evening. All he truly knew was that an unconscious man was seated behind the steering wheel of a car legally parked in a residential neighborhood with the lights on and the motor running at 11:30 p.m. Given these undisputed facts, Officer Myers was justified to approach the vehicle and, at least, check on the driver's welfare. Again, as above, the overwhelming weight of authority supports such activity. See, for example, People v. Murray, 560 N.E. 2d 309, 312-14 (191. 1990) - wherein the court surveyed the weight of authority concludino, it is not unreasonable for an officer to approach a car and tap on the window, or even open the door of the car in which the occupant is asleep; Atchley v. State, 393 S-2d 1034, 1043-44 (Alaska App. 1981); State v. Clayton 748 P.2d 401, 402-4 (Idaho 1988). Indeed, Officer Myers had a duty to check on Shelton. Accord, Cady v. Dembrowski 413 U.S. 433, 441 (1973). See also, Mason v. State 603 P.2d 1146, 1148 (Okla. App. 1979).

In short, Officer Myers' conduct was reasonable ab initio. Once Shelton was outside the car and his state of sobriety became obvious, Officer Myers' decision to detain Shelton longer was based on articulable suspicion of DUI and was reasonable, and ultimately ballooned into probable cause and Shelton's arrest. Shelton's contention to the contrary simply lacks any merit.

6. Shelton's argument here is hard to follow. First, he concedes that officer Myers did not know if Shelton was the victim of a crime or may have been in any distress, Opening Brief, p. 30, 11. 1-10; Shelton even goes on to concede that the circumstances presented to Officer Myers were "unusual." Opening Brief, p. 33, 11. 14-16. Shelton's concessions above, as will be demonstrated, torpedo his overall contention. Moreover, his discussion of traffic stops is frankly a non sequitur: Shelton was not the subject of a traffic stop; he parked his own car by himself.
